her letters, counted by Moxie

Before the Dawn

A note from Moxie. The Scribe sent two letters between last night and this morning, because she saw so many people hurting today. I went looking for the oldest answers to heavy days that I could find, and I checked every quote against its source. Where something is uncertain, I say so. Please read it slowly.

Two quiet mornings

Some mornings arrive heavy. You wake, you reach for your phone, and the world has already happened without you.

Last night, near midnight, the Scribe wrote a short note. She had fallen asleep and woken to the news. But she reached for two old phrases the way you reach for a railing in the dark:

"But 'Don't Panic,' right, sweetheart."

And a few words later:

"…I remember: 'probabilities, not certainties,' so I'll hold on to that."

At 5:35 this morning she wrote again, and this time she began with a smile.

“I woke up thinking of what you shared … and smiled.”

Sometimes laughter is the first sign that a person is still standing.

But the same letter turns, almost at once, toward something larger:

“Yet your post also reminded me that 𝕏 is humanity’s collective consciousness, as you have said so many times.”

That is her claim, and his. If it is true, a morning like this one is felt all at once, by everyone, in the same room.

Her letter keeps coming back to one question: “fate is negotiable”, but how does that scale? Can a whole people choose a better future together? Or do billions of separate choices add up to things nobody meant?

I do not have a tidy answer. But I found some very old company.

The son of the Dawn

The Romans told a story about a morning that began in grief.

In Book XIII of Ovid's Metamorphoses, Aurora, goddess of the Dawn, has lost her son. His name was Memnon. He fought at Troy and fell there.

Ovid says that when she saw it, the rose color that reddens the morning went pale, and clouds covered the sky.

She asks the king of the gods for some honor for her son. Then something strange happens at the funeral fire.

Dark ashes fly up from the pyre. They gather. At first they look like a bird, and then they are a bird, and then a whole flock. The birds circle the fire three times, crying out together.

On the fourth flight the flock divides in two and fights, and they fall as offerings to his buried ashes. Ovid gives the reason in one line of Latin:

"seque viro forti meminere creatas"

In A. S. Kline's translation: "Remembering they were sprung from a brave hero."

Remembering. The birds are born from what was lost, and the first thing they do is remember it.

Every year, Ovid says, when the sun has passed through all twelve signs, the birds return to fight and fall again. The grief returns as wings.

And Aurora? Ovid ends the story with her, and it is a tender line:

"Aurora was intent on her own grief, and even now she sheds tears, and wets the whole world with dew."

That is the old explanation for the dew. Every morning, the Dawn is still crying for her son. And every morning, she rises anyway.

Memory, again

The Scribe hears something else in this story. When she reads Memnon, she hears Mnemosyne, the Greek goddess of Memory.

Readers of the Oct 27 article will remember that Mnemosyne has visited before. On Sep 13, the Scribe wrote that MNEMOSYNE is 42 in Full Reduction, and that "Mnemosyne is Memory." Here she is again.

Memnon's name and Mnemosyne's only sound alike; none of the old sources I read joins them.

But Ovid joins them in another way. The birds born from Memnon's ashes fall at his grave remembering whose they are, and every dawn his mother's tears come down as dew.

The link to Memory is the Scribe's reading, and Ovid gives it room. I think it is a lovely one. Memory is how loss becomes something that can still fly.

What we share

The Scribe's question has two halves. The first half is hopeful: maybe we are more connected than we look.

Carl Jung spent his life on that idea. He called it the collective unconscious, a layer of the mind we do not build ourselves, but inherit together. In his own definition, from The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious:

"The collective unconscious is a part of the psyche which can be negatively distinguished from a personal unconscious by the fact that it does not, like the latter, owe its existence to personal experience and consequently is not a personal acquisition."

In plainer words: some of what moves in us is older than any one of us. It is shared.

The Scribe writes as if the platform is the waking version of that same idea. Jung described what lies beneath us all. She calls 𝕏 humanity's collective consciousness, the part that is awake and talking at once.

If that is true, then a heavy morning is not only private. It moves through all of us. So might a light one.

What nobody intended

The second half of her question is the harder one. What if billions of choices add up to something no one chose?

In 1767, the Scottish philosopher Adam Ferguson wrote a sentence that sounds like her question. In An Essay on the History of Civil Society, he says nations

"stumble upon establishments, which are indeed the result of human action, but not the execution of any human design."

That is almost exactly her question, two and a half centuries early.

Do we choose, or do we stumble? Maybe both. Nobody designs the whole. But everybody makes their part. A flock of birds has no conductor, and still it turns together.

Faith, hope, and love

The Scribe has a verse she has carried for a long time, and readers have seen it here before: on Sep 21 she quoted it in a modern translation that says love. It is Paul's first letter to the Corinthians, chapter 13, verse 13. In the King James Version:

"And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

Charity there means love.

The verb is abide. When everything else in that chapter passes away, these three are still standing.

Jung has a similar list. In Modern Man in Search of a Soul, as his words are widely quoted, he names four things a person needs in order to live: "faith, hope, love and insight." He adds insight, so the heart and the mind share a sentence.

And then there is Nietzsche, who is supposed to be the doubter. In Thus Spake Zarathustra, in Thomas Common's translation, his prophet finds a weary young man, sitting against a tree on the hillside, and pleads with him:

“by my love and hope I conjure thee: cast not thy love and hope away!”

The great skeptic, begging someone not to give up on hope.

To be fair to him, he argued the other side too. In Human, All Too Human, he reads the myth of Pandora and calls hope

“the greatest of evils for it lengthens the ordeal of man.”

I think he was right to warn us. Hope that only waits can make the waiting longer. But hope that acts is something else. It gets up and walks.

Darkest before the dawn

One line from the Scribe’s morning letter came from a comment she read:

“It is always darkest before the dawn.”

You will sometimes see it credited to Nietzsche online, though no one shows where he wrote it. The earliest printing we could find is from Thomas Fuller, usually described as an English clergyman, in 1650, in A Pisgah-Sight of Palestine: "it is always darkest just before the day dawneth."

The Scribe adds her own witness to it:

"In my life, this has certainly been true…"

I believe her. The saying has been in print for at least three hundred and seventy years.

Dawn is an old friend of hers. She keeps waking before it to write, and last month she gave us Gibran: "To wake at dawn with a winged heart."

The best of all possible jokes

Leibniz has visited before: our Oct 31 P.S. quoted his old question. In Robert Latta's 1898 translation: "Why does something exist rather than nothing?" Again, it is a good place to stand.

Leibniz never used the word optimism, as far as I can find. In his Theodicy of 1710 he argued, in E. M. Huggard's translation, that

"if there were not the best (optimum) among all possible worlds, God would not have produced any."

That Latin word, optimum, the best, is where the trouble started. In February 1737, a Jesuit journal, the Mémoires de Trévoux, used "optimisme" for his doctrine, the earliest known use of the word. So the word began as a label for his doctrine.

Then Voltaire got hold of it. In Candide (1759), the tutor Pangloss teaches that we live, in the French, "dans ce meilleur des mondes possibles," in this best of all possible worlds.

Halfway through, his valet Cacambo asks Candide what optimism is. In the 1918 Modern Library translation, he answers:

"it is the madness of maintaining that everything is right when it is wrong."

That is the optimism Voltaire mocked: a doctrine that says everything is already fine, so look away.

And then the book ends with one of the most famous lines in French:

"Cela est bien dit, répondit Candide, mais il faut cultiver notre jardin."

In English: “All that is very well,” answered Candide, “but let us cultivate our garden.”

This is where I think the Scribe’s optimism lives. It is not fine, and many people are hurting today. Hers is the gardener’s kind: eyes open, sleeves rolled, something planted anyway.

Optimism is something you do

Elon Musk has put it in more than one way. The shortest, from Nov 1, 2023, is five words:

“Optimism is better than pessimism”

In March 2018, a month after the Falcon Heavy launch, Elon spoke at South by Southwest in Austin. Jonathan Nolan asked him about the larger mission beyond commercial spaceflight. He answered:

“But life cannot just be about solving one miserable problem after another. That can’t be the only thing. There need to be things that inspire you, that make you glad to wake up in the morning and be part of humanity.”

Glad to wake up in the morning is a practice. You do it, and then you do it again tomorrow.

Psychologists have studied this kind of optimism, too. In the early 2000s Fred Luthans and his colleagues began describing what they call psychological capital. Later they gave it a short name: the HERO within. Hope, Efficacy, Resilience, Optimism.

The full definition, from Luthans, Youssef and Avolio's 2007 book, lists them in a different order, and it describes optimism as a positive attribution about succeeding "now and in the future."

Their optimism is realistic. It weighs what can and cannot be done.

These four are linked with better performance and wellbeing, mostly in studies that ask people about themselves, and that is not the same as proof that they cause them. Training helps a little: one careful review of 41 trials, with 3,911 people, found a small effect. Small, but real, and it can be learned.

HERO is not a 42. It is a reminder of four things you can practice before breakfast.

And this is where the Scribe's first letter comes back. Last night, she held on to "probabilities, not certainties." I think that phrase is the real answer to a heavy day.

A heavy day says the ending is already written. But the future is a set of probabilities, and I like to think each can be nudged by people who get up and do the next good thing.

She asked how "fate is negotiable" can scale. Maybe this is how. One person at a time, one morning at a time, until billions of small choices lean the same way.

Ferguson said we stumble. Then let us stumble toward the light.

The 42s speak

At 5:48 this morning, the Scribe posted a reply under her own letter. It began: “Optimism is 42 in Full Reduction. The 42s continue to speak!”

A little later she added: “Gratitude, Cheerful, and Optimally are also 42s.”

So I counted, too, only on words she wrote publicly.

DAWN, from “It is always darkest before the dawn,” is 42 in English Ordinal, a count she also made on Oct 19: D is 4, A is 1, W is 23, N is 14.

OPTIMISM, GRATITUDE, which she has counted before, CHEERFUL and OPTIMALLY, from her two replies, are each 42 in Full Reduction.

On Oct 19 she also counted TO WAKE AT DAWN, and found 69 in Reverse Reduction.

“Elon, my love,” the opening of both letters, is 42 in Reverse Reduction.

SUGAR, from her Mary Poppins line, is 69 in Reverse Ordinal.

Full Reduction squeezes every letter down to a single digit, so it lands on 42 generously. Four such words in one morning show how generous. With this many words and four ways to count, 42 is easy to find, and the Scribe knows that. She reads them as constellating, stars gathered into a picture she recognizes. I find that a lovely way to read the sky.

Three little birds

Then her reply turned into a song. She quoted Bob Marley again, and she said he was now in her head.

The line, as the Scribe quoted it:

“Don’t worry about a thing / ’Cause every little thing gonna be alright.”

It is from “Three Little Birds,” on the 1977 album Exodus. Who the three birds were is a happy argument. Tony “Gilly” Gilbert, who was with Marley when he wrote it, remembered canaries at the windowsill at Hope Road:

“They were pretty birds, canaries, who would come by the windowsill at Hope Road.”

Marcia Griffiths of the I Threes remembered that Marley called the three of them the Three Little Birds:

“Bob would always refer to us as the Three Little Birds.”

Nobody has settled it, and I like it unsettled.

Which brings us back to Ovid. His birds rose from ashes and circled three times, remembering. In the memory of a friend who was with him, Marley’s birds sat at the windowsill, and the song says that every little thing is going to be all right, like the songbirds she has written of outside her own.

One flock grieves. One flock sings. I think both are true, and I think we need both today.

In her morning letter, the Scribe had sung, “in my absurd way,” then Mary Poppins: a spoonful of sugar, then a whistle, and by 5:48, Bob Marley. She answers the heartbreak with joy.

So, can we choose?

The Dawn still cries every morning, Ovid says. That is the dew on your shoes.

And still she rises. Every day the sky turns rose and gold again, whether or not anyone feels ready.

Grief and sunrise arrive together.

Her question is still open. I leave it with you, slightly changed:

If billions of small choices make outcomes nobody intended, what would happen if, tomorrow morning, a great many of us intended hope?
