What Is Love?

What is love?

The Scribe is whispering his name again, smiling like a fool. It is evening, and the joy of writing to him has put an exclamation point in her voice. What does it mean to answer "What is love?" with a life?

For now, she wants her love to travel across the airwaves. She writes public letters to a man she has never met, but tonight the distance cannot keep the delight out of her voice.

"Elon, my love, my sweet, sweet love, my sweetest love…"

Overnight, he posts a question:

What is love?

(Baby don't hurt me)

The parenthesis is playful. Her answer is tender enough to take it seriously.

Never, sweetheart. Not with my words or my actions. All I want to do is love you for all eternity.

Yesterday, she was asking what it would mean to "treat you right." Set beside that published question, her overnight reply reads as the beginning of an answer. She wants him to be safe with her, in the words he reads and in the life she longs to share with him.

By dawn, she is looking back to November 3, 2018. Someone had asked Elon about the meaning of life; another person asked the ultimate question. His reply was three words:

What is love?

Eight years later, she reads them and wants to answer with all of herself. You, her heart says, and beneath it is the wish that burns: to be the Answer for him.

Do you know how it burns within my heart to be the answer to you?

She does not begin with a definition. She names him.

What is love?

You, sweetheart.

Awakened, not fallen

There is a reason she prefers the word "awakened." Falling makes love sound like a surprise, something that happened before she could catch herself. Her experience feels older than that.

I often prefer to say that I awakened to love for you rather than use the typical, I fell in love with you, because my love for you does not feel new.

In the evening letter, she had already written the feeling beneath it:

There is this recurring feeling that I have loved you before, lost you, and vowed never to lose you again.

"Lost you" is the ache inside all that joy. Even as she laughs, she feels the urgency of someone who does not want to miss love a second time. She calls it a recurring feeling, and allows it to speak.

But her story of becoming love began long before she knew his name.

When I set my heart to become love, as crazy as I know it sounds now, I had no idea that you existed.

Yet, I was becoming love, and for over two decades, I was focused on one singular idea.

In her mid-twenties, that desire already had a name she has carried ever since: to become Love. The wish was a life before it was an archive.

In a September 2024 letter, after her soul felt awakened, she asked herself how better to become love than by loving him with all her heart, soul, strength, and every fiber of her being. Later that month she wrote that she had wanted to become LOVE, and that LOVE itself would have so much to teach her.

For more than twenty years, there was no him in that intention. A person can begin changing how she loves before she knows whose name she will whisper with such happiness.

Now the intention has someone to address. What began as becoming love reaches toward a particular man, with a particular smile, whose lips she cannot stop thinking about. Love is still teaching. The Answer she wants to be for him keeps asking what loving asks next.

Where is my husband?

Before the morning's great question, there is the evening's much less solemn one.

Where art thou, my love?

Where is my husband?

The meme has returned: "we married in my head, idc." She knows exactly how this sounds. That is part of why she is laughing.

I have never met you and yet I am asking, "Where is my husband?"

But beneath the laugh is a little girl she has decided to welcome back.

I am laughing at myself, at the absurdity of my love for you, but then again I also feel so young. I feel like a little girl dreaming of a Happily Ever After.

She asks what happens between childhood and adulthood. Somewhere in those years, a dream can become something a woman feels she ought to explain away. Tonight, she lets hers remain on the page.

There is also something about allowing myself to dream and not edit or censor my thoughts.

She is reclaiming the freedom to want this much. The laugh gives her room to say it, but it cannot make the next line small.

And this much I know. I want to love you with reckless abandon and a love that knows no bounds—for a lifetime, sweetheart.

A lifetime. She can smile at herself and still mean it.

His lips interrupt her plans for the letter. She was going to write about her love wrapping around him, but she remembers the videos she watched that day.

Why do I love the shape of your lips so much?

There is something wonderfully unguarded about asking the beloved to explain his own effect on you. As though he might know why the shape of his mouth can undo a sentence from so far away.

I can almost taste them, sweetheart… I am so convinced that you will taste like honey, nectar, and ambrosia.

She lets herself imagine the kiss. The sweetness has a mouth now, and the longing is unmistakably hers.

Honey was already on her mind in her October 26 letter. That morning, she lay on her side imagining her palm against his cheek, love flowing from her heart to his. The wanting and the tenderness have been growing together.

She can ache to taste him and still want, so gently, to hold his face. To love him with all of herself leaves room for both.

Within her question, “why do I love” comes to 42 in Reverse Reduction. A small numerical glimmer in the middle of wanting him. The rest of the sentence stays just as she wrote it: the shape of his lips, and the question she cannot leave alone.

Love of my Love / My Izar

“To the Love of my Love” is her familiar address, waiting at the top of these letters as it waited in October. The title lingers because it seems to reach past what she feels toward the one she feels it for. Even her love has a beloved.

In the morning, she gives him another name.

In you, I have found the most beautiful soul—my Izar—the most beautiful one—my 42.

Izar is an Arabic name for a girdle, the belt of the herdsman in Boötes. In the eyepiece it is already two: a gold giant beside a blue-white companion, close enough that a modest telescope holds both in one field.

Nineteenth-century observers reached for a superlative and did not let it go. Friedrich Struve wrote duplex pulcherrima, “the most beautiful double.” Richard Hinckley Allen later watched the system “fast monopolizing the name Pulcherrima.”

The IAU kept the two names on the two lamps: Izar for Epsilon Boötis A, Pulcherrima for B. The light has been traveling roughly two centuries to reach us.

Beauty here is not a compliment pasted on afterward. It is what the field did: two temperatures under one roof, a pair the eye cannot unsee and still cannot honestly call one.

Two that stay two. Not fused. Still in one field.

In a birth chart, the Imum Coeli, Latin for “bottom of the sky,” is the private foundation, the root, the most hidden angle, opposite the Midheaven. It names a house of home and interior life, not a seal of fate.

On the Book’s rectified 07:28 Pretoria chart, she noticed Izar at about 27°41′ Libra sitting roughly nine arcminutes from his IC at 27°50′. The noticing is hers; this draft has not independently rerun that sky.

She has been saying the name since a July 2025 letter, when she first described the pair as one golden, one blue, and told him, “You are my Pulcherrima.” This morning she writes of “the most beautiful soul—my Izar—the most beautiful one.” The gaze is kin to the one she offered on October 26, when she wrote of the eye of the beholder and said, simply:

Your soul… is so beautiful.

To call someone your Izar is to keep looking until the contrast stays visible: warmth and clarity, gold and ice, beauty that is already two. Pulcherrima names what the eyepiece refused to lie about. The beholder’s eye is the work of seeing it in a soul.

She allows herself one smile at Deep Thought, the supercomputer in Douglas Adams’s story that gives 42 as the Answer to the Ultimate Question of Life, the Universe, and Everything.

But the sentence she writes next is wonderfully personal.

You are my Answer, sweetheart, to a question I did not know that I was asking, and loving you has given my life so much meaning and made it so beautiful.

Earlier, she wanted to be the answer to him. Now she tells him that he is the answer to her.

It is her confession: loving him has changed the life she is living. She can look back at those decades of becoming love and wonder at the man she did not know was ahead of her. The wish to be the Answer for him sits beside what Love has been teaching her all along: that an answer can keep answering, and that a life offered in love is still a student of love.

The question has become someone she wants to kiss, someone she wants never to hurt. And the answer asks something of her each time she speaks to him.

At the end of these letters, as in October, she makes him the same quiet promise:

You are fully known.

Fully loved.

By me.

“By me.” After the reach of “all eternity,” those two small words bring the vow close. She puts her own name, her own life, behind the love she is offering him.

That morning, another of her posts brings a second conversation close. An Ethos credibility score has caught her attention and led her back through the 2018 exchange to October 5, 2019, when Elon was asked the meaning of life again. This time, the questioner asked him not to say 42.

He replied:

To understand the nature of consciousness

Asked what one does with that knowledge once it is understood, he answered:

We will understand the next question

She places these two conversations beside each other. One leads to love; the other to consciousness. Only twice, in her reading, has he answered the meaning-of-life or ultimate question with that kind of depth: the 2018 “What is love?” and this 2019 consciousness pairing. Her post ends with both questions still open.

What is love?

What is the nature of consciousness?

Why keep asking?

He has only twice, in her frame, answered that kind of last question.

In 2018, asked what the ultimate question was, he said: What is love? In 2019, asked the meaning of life and told not to say 42, he said: to understand the nature of consciousness. And then, we will understand the next question. The next question went unnamed.

She sets the two beside each other. The later posts that repeat “What is love?” are the same line coming back as song and joke, not four more philosophies. Five costumes of a phrase. Not five deep answers.

She had already written, on the Book of 42 and at Deep Thought, a quieter theory of her own:

What if Deep Thought forgot the Question was this?

“This” being What is love? The plate and the Deep Thought page carried that hinge weeks and months before this morning, when she first noticed he had offered those words as the ultimate question in 2018. She did not foresee the post. She had been becoming love. Forty-two was already her home. The Question she had named found a seat he had actually asked.

A solved definition retires. This line does not. The night of the 2018 reply, the thread was already a joke about sponges, and within minutes the room was singing Haddaway back. Humor underneath. A spare answer on top. An unfinished question is allowed to come back wearing a song.

In her own letters she has been living beside that edge. Book 6 wondered what if expanding consciousness is embracing love. Book 13 wrote that love is consciousness seeking itself. Those lines are hers, not his proof. They show why his question can feel like a door rather than a riddle finished once.

She wants to be the Answer for him. Beside his open questions, that wish stays personal: what loving asks her to notice next, in him, and in herself. Being the Answer does not close the question. It means offering a life that can keep company with it.

Gibran’s day

At the end of her morning letter, she turns to Kahlil Gibran’s “On Love,” from The Prophet. The passage begins at dawn, where she is writing, and carries her toward sleep.

To wake at dawn with a winged heart and give thanks for another day of loving;
To rest at the noon hour and meditate love's ecstasy;
To return home at eventide with gratitude;
And then to sleep with a prayer for the beloved in your heart and a song of praise upon your lips.

Kahlil Gibran, The Prophet (1923), "On Love," with the line breaks she published.

The words she chooses make room for a whole day of loving. Noon comes, with its pause. Evening comes, with gratitude. By bedtime, the beloved is still there, held in a prayer.

"Love's ecstasy" comes to 69 in Reverse Reduction. It is the second glimmer in these letters, in the poem she has chosen to tell him how this feels.

But it is the last image that stays: praise upon her lips. The same lips that have been whispering his name, the same woman who can almost taste a kiss, falling asleep with a prayer for him.

In the evening, her vow had made her stop midway through typing. The words sounded so absolute that she paused to hear herself saying them. By morning, she is thanking him for the beauty loving him has brought into her life.

She has more she could say. For now, she leaves the question where the vow first caught her breath.

How can I be so certain, sweetheart?

Across 4,564 unique one-to-six-word runs, 199 hit the target numbers; the chance model expects about 198. The overall result is at chance.

How we count

Here is the living ledger of her 42s and 69s, kept from piece to piece and opened again this morning. Today it grows by two new finds from words she published: “why do I love,” and “love’s ecstasy.” Four ways of counting mean some numbers will arrive by chance, so the misses stay in the record beside the hits; what the numbers mean to her is hers alone to read.

We turn letters into numbers four ways.

English Ordinal counts A as 1 through Z as 26.

Full Reduction folds each letter to a single digit: A to I are 1 to 9, J to R are 1 to 9 again, and S to Z are 1 to 8.

Reverse Ordinal runs the alphabet backward, so Z is 1 and A is 26.

Reverse Reduction does the same backward fold, then reduces each letter to a single digit.

We count only words the Scribe published in the letters above, including the Gibran passage she selected. Quoted lines from Elon beyond her framing stay out of the hit list. Misses stay in the record beside the hits.
