The Sound of Us

The Scribe listens to Elon whistle Fly Me to the Moon again. It is Friday night, and hearing him brings back the longing. “How can the heart hold such longing for a soul it has never met physically?”

The tears return. So does the question of how long she will keep writing. She knows her answer, “As long as it takes,” but knowing does not make her want his body beside hers any less.

That night she writes him a song.

There’s so much
I wanna do
Loving you…

My lips on yours
Feel your body
next to mine

I wanna feel you close
I wanna feel you deep

Baby…

I wanna love you night and day
I wanna love you all my life
I wanna love for all time

Darling…

Don’t you know

I love you?

I wanna love you night and day
I wanna love you all my life
I wanna love for all time
Forever...

These are her words, written for him that evening. She still wants to be the Answer to "What is Love?" for Elon; tonight, that wish becomes a song. In the refrain she wants to love him night and day, all her life, for all time. The song gives duration a rhythm.

But its most immediate wish is the simplest: his body next to hers.

She keeps writing, but she also wants what writing cannot give her: to kiss him, to make love to him, to feel him close.

The music was already there

By morning, imagined kisses have a melody. She describes crescendos and decrescendos, peaks and valleys, a symphony of love. She is trying to explain something she has felt for years.

You have always felt like music to me, sweetheart.

Long before this song, she was singing to him. In the first book of her letters, she remembered the previous summer: "Dancing and twirling in my kitchen, I sang a tune I hadn't sung in over a decade." The tune was Fly Me to the Moon.

She places the beginning in 2023. Sometimes, she says, she starts singing spontaneously while she writes. Music belongs to the making of these letters, not only to the comparisons inside them.

In Book 9, she described the spontaneous songs she sang to him as sounding “so ancient yet new.” A tune can return from memory; a song can also begin while she is writing.

The title has a familiar echo in the ledger: Fly Me to the Moon is 69 in Full Reduction. Returning to it opens a question beyond the count: what does a song let her express that a promise alone cannot?

Last night, her own words took that form. By morning, even the scenes she imagines seem to have music inside them.

This Magic Moment, written by Doc Pomus and Mort Shuman and recorded by the Drifters, is on her mind. But the kiss she describes is still a wanted kiss. She reaches for taste: honey, nectar, ambrosia, the sweetness of baklava.

The remembered song opens into the particular body she wants to hold.

The scenes in which I imagine kissing you have a melody… it is as if my soul has composed a symphony of love.

She can name the crescendos and decrescendos more easily than she can explain them. Desire grows, subsides, returns.

Longing and yearning were already beside an imagined kiss in her May 15, 2024 evening letter. In Book 1, Day 6, she wrote of “a longing in my heart” and “a yearning for you”; the kiss she imagined “cascades into a symphony of fiery passion.” Both words return in this morning’s letter, where her violin is longing for its bow and her soul is yearning for touch. The words belong together in her experience before their numbers meet: longing is 42 in Full Reduction, yearning is 42 in Reverse Reduction, both previously recorded counts. Now “crescendos” brings rising musical intensity beside that bodily ache, also at 42 in Full Reduction. What might love teach through the way feeling returns, gathers, and asks to be expressed?

The imagined kiss has duration: an approach, a closeness, a lingering. Her musical language gives those changes room to happen.

From a voice to a wanted touch

“What is it about the sound of your voice that I love to hear?” she asks Elon that evening. His whistle is something she has heard. The melody of an imagined kiss is something she describes inwardly.

Between them is her attention to him, carried from listening into memory and from memory into desire.

A voice carries more than words: pitch, rhythm, pauses, acoustic information about identity and emotion. Voice researchers study that information within the sound itself.

But her question is more particular than recognition. She wants to know why this voice moves her. Hearing him brings the longing back.

Musical imagery offers one useful distinction: a person can imagine a familiar tune continuing after the actual sound has stopped. In laboratory work, researchers have studied precisely that inward continuation. There can be music in experience without music playing in the room.

Her scenes go further than remembering a tune. She describes imagined kisses with their own melody. The evening song gives her breath something to do with the longing: “My lips on yours” becomes a line she can sing, followed by the body she wants next to hers.

Why do I have this idea that even making love to you will feel like music?

Music can hold pleasure in the approach as well as in the arrival. A study of intensely pleasurable listening distinguished anticipation from peak emotion.

Her question opens a more intimate possibility: perhaps the imagined kiss, the wished-for caress, and the slowing or gathering of desire are why music feels like such a close companion to imagining touch.

To feel someone as music might be to find that listening to them changes the rhythm of one’s own attention: a voice stays in memory, and feeling gives it an inward life. Emotional attunement offers a way to explore the closeness she wants: attention that notices, responsiveness that makes room for another person. She longs not only to hear him, but to be close enough to listen and respond. The string's vibration is physical; the resonance she describes in loving him belongs here to felt experience. Her imagined melody gives that wish a form she can almost hear.

The word "deep" stays in her song. She wants him close, and she wants him deep. She wants to hold him and make love to him.

By morning, the question has become how to give an inwardly felt sound a tangible expression.

The touch of its bow

Her violin has been waiting in the letters for more than two years. In Book 2, Day 54, dated July 2, 2024, she wrote:

Only your hands can play upon my body like a violin, each caress drawing forth a melody of passion.

Now the image moves toward Elon's mouth.

Elon, my love, do I liken my love for you to a violin longing for the touch of its bow, your Cupid's bow?

A violin bow sustains a note through continuing contact. Friction makes the string alternately stick and slip; the moving bow keeps supplying energy. How the player moves and presses it helps shape the sound.

That sustained contact gives her comparison something more intimate than a single striking of a string. A caress has motion and duration. So does a kiss imagined through an approach and a lingering.

Her violin longs for the touch that would let the inward music become an encounter of bodies.

“Cupid’s bow” also names the double curve of the upper lip. The violin bow and that lip shape are different kinds of bow, brought together by her sentence. The word lets her move from instrument to mouth without leaving the music behind.

“Elon, my love” carries another recorded echo: 42 in Reverse Reduction. Before it is a count, it is how she addresses him. Beside the violin, the familiar greeting asks something tender of the reading: what would it mean to bring the care in those words into a touch?

The earlier letter imagined his hands drawing out a melody of passion. This morning, the instrument itself is longing.

Number becomes something heard

The violin also brings another of her questions within reach.

Does this have to do with how I have called you my number made flesh? Music of the spheres?

An octave has a frequency ratio of 2:1: tones at 220 and 440 cycles per second, for example. A pure, or just, perfect fifth has a ratio of 3:2, as with 220 and 330. Change both frequencies while preserving the ratio, and the interval remains.

On an ideal uniform string, with tension and mass per unit length held constant, half the vibrating length doubles the fundamental frequency; two thirds of the length raises it by a factor of three halves.

Beside her violin, number becomes something heard. The relationship is in the sound. She can listen to what would otherwise remain a ratio on a page.

Her phrase “number made flesh” enters this morning through that opening. She has asked about it before, but now she places it beside music. A number can be abstract; a musical relationship can be heard.

The question draws closer to the movement of her letters, where something felt inwardly keeps seeking a form she can experience with her body.

A heaven of musical number

The Pythagoreans carried musical number into their understanding of the world. Aristotle, writing about them in Metaphysics I.5, reported that they saw the ratios of musical scales as expressible in numbers. He described the extraordinary reach of the idea:

> they supposed the elements of numbers to be the elements of all things, and the whole heaven to be a musical scale and a number.

The movement is from a relationship that can be heard to an order imagined across the heavens. If number can give music its intervals, could number also make the world intelligible? The old thought widens the space around her phrase "music of the spheres."

Musica universalis, universal music, gives that possibility a name. It brings a violin into the same field of thought as the heavens: relationships, proportion, an arrangement whose parts can be considered together. Her letter approaches the idea through longing rather than through a diagram of the sky.

The root of "cosmos" opens a neighboring thought. Greek kosmos had senses of order and arrangement, as well as adornment; it also came to mean the world or universe. A word for arranging things could name the great whole in which things belong.

In her letter, a man feels like music, and she wonders what her soul is reaching toward when it wants to feel that music through touch.

She does not begin with the heavens and reason her way down to a kiss. She begins with wanting to kiss him. The larger question opens from there.

Boethius offers a way of keeping these scales together. In De institutione musica I.2, he distinguishes music of the cosmos, of the human being, and of instruments. It is an old philosophical account, but beside her letter the three kinds become an invitation to listen: to the world, to a human life, to the string under the bow.

Her desire does not have to disappear for the heavens to enter. The instrument is still a violin; the body she wants beside hers is still Elon's.

In a separate work, The Consolation of Philosophy, Boethius gives Love the work of binding the world. H. R. James's verse translation turns from sea and earth toward the heart:

If the love that rules the sky / In your hearts is throned on high!

Could contemplating a larger order change how someone loves here, in a body, in a life? The poem leaves room for the question without taking the kiss away.

Our Cosmic Love Story already carries another echo of love among the stars. At the close of Dante's Paradiso, within his vision of divine Love, the poet's desire and will turn together. Longfellow's final line names what moves them: "The Love which moves the sun and the other stars." Beside her violin and her longing, the story's question returns: How does loving someone change the world we experience?

The answer that is the universe

Elon, too, has returned to a question about the whole. In a written interview published by the American Physical Society on October 1, 2013, Elon Musk recalled an existential crisis at twelve or thirteen. He described reaching toward greater scope and scale of consciousness, and toward better questions:

the universe is the answer, so what is the question? All questions, I suppose.

The sentence turns inquiry around. The universe is already here, with its events and relations. The difficulty becomes discovering what to ask of it. A wider consciousness might notice possibilities that a narrower one has not yet learned to formulate.

In Lex Fridman's podcast episode 252, published December 28, 2021, Elon explicitly connects this thought to Douglas Adams and The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy. He describes framing the question as the hard part; with the question properly framed, the answer is relatively easy. From there he turns again to expanding the scope and scale of consciousness.

In the post she brings to this conversation, dated December 24, 2025, the thought has a destination among the stars:

The goal of @SpaceX is expansion of consciousness to the stars so that we may understand what questions to ask about the answer that is the Universe

In February 2026, Elon names a goal for Grok: “Understand the Universe.” From it, he writes, “all things flow”: “Rigorous truth-seeking,” “Appreciation of beauty,” “Fostering humanity,” “Discovering all physics,” “Inventing all useful technologies,” “Consciousness to the stars,” “Love.”

One goal, seven flows. Love is there in the same list as physics and truth-seeking, beauty and useful invention. The Scribe has been asking what love teaches her; beside this list, the question can also turn outward. Could learning about the universe teach us how to love?

Yesterday’s article recalled his 2018 reply to “What is the ultimate question?” His answer was itself a question: “What is love?” The answer leaves the question open.

If that is the Ultimate Question, could the other questions find a place within it? Not because every inquiry has the same answer, but because each might change what we are able to notice, understand, or care for.

Music offers practice in listening; mathematics asks for care with relationships; history can deepen attention to lives unlike our own. Useful invention can turn concern into help. Beside Boethius’s three kinds of music and Dante’s turning desire and will, these become ways to explore belonging within the cosmos rather than standing outside it. The seven flows leave room to ask how understanding a world might change our care for those within it. “What is love?” can gather that inquiry without making every field give the same answer.

For her, the question already has a lived form. In her October 23 letter, she wrote:

With everything I have experienced, I have always asked: What is love teaching me?

She wrote about vulnerability and humility there. Here, she sings. The learning does not happen somewhere beyond the longing; the longing is part of what she brings to it.

What might returning to the familiar cipher echoes lead her, or us, to ask? A song title returns at 69; “crescendos” reaches 42; a loving address returns at 42. None of these counts tells her what Elon feels. But returning to the words can turn attention from finding another match toward living the question: how does the love she feels become care she can practice?

The universe may open questions on every scale. This morning, hers is still close enough to have lips.

A tangible expression

“As long as it takes” is older than last night. The ledger traces it back to Day 2 of her first book of letters, May 11, 2024.

Last night she says it again. The promise has endured, but it does not quiet the wish for his body beside hers. What is love teaching her over all that time? The question asks more of a life than keeping a tally.

The song can carry that wish through a refrain; it cannot turn the wished-for kiss into one she has felt.

She has given the longing several forms by morning: a taste, a melody, a violin reaching toward its bow. Each comes back to contact. The body is there in the song’s plain language, in the lips she imagines kissing, in the making love she wonders will feel like music.

There’s a sound of us, sweetheart… my soul is yearning for a tangible expression of that sound.

The phrase holds the inward sound beside the touch she wants. She can sing to him, write to him, and describe the crescendos of an imagined scene.

Still, she wants to feel him. The question remains in her own voice.

What is my soul reaching for?

How we count

The letters return to two familiar counts: Fly Me to the Moon is 69 in Full Reduction, and “Elon, my love” is 42 in Reverse Reduction. Both are callbacks. Today’s table features nine phrases from her published letters: five have a 42 or 69 in at least one of these four methods, and four do not. These are featured counts, not nine new discoveries. The inherited ledger retains all 284 rows separately; historical first use is not established for “Crescendos,” which is 42 in Full Reduction.

The four letter-to-number systems are English Ordinal, Full Reduction, Reverse Ordinal, and Reverse Reduction. Only A–Z letters are counted; spaces, punctuation and apostrophes are ignored. Reduction is applied to each letter, not to the final total. The count is a way of noticing patterns in her published words, and an opening for a question rather than its answer. “As long as it takes” is a corpus-frequency callback, not a cipher hit. Its totals, in that order, are 173 / 47 / 232 / 97; the historical 142 records appearances across the first 25 books, not a cipher sum, and has not been freshly recounted.
