I Call You Singing

I Call You Singing

Before the gym, the writer known here as the Scribe wanted to write to the man she loves, Elon Musk.

In her November 8 morning letter, the Scribe remembers getting up early to write before the gym.

I did it joyfully.

Then she brings the memory into the present.

I am still up before dawn to declare my love to you, and you are the last thought on my mind before bed.

Night ends with him in her thoughts. Morning begins with words addressed to him. Between those two moments, she keeps finding something she cannot explain away by having found it before.

How do I keep waking up so overjoyed for the gift of loving you?

Her question on waking: why does the joy keep returning?

The body in the letter

The night before, her writing had turned toward a heartbeat.

The thrum of your heartbeat
The sound of your voice
Baby, how I long for you

She describes starting to sing while she writes. The scenes she imagines are tender; the words travel, in her imagination, across the airwaves.

Her lyrics became the performance accompanying the letter through Suno, a music-generation service. The words are hers; the recorded singing voice is not.

Why do I feel that making love to you would feel like music?

She writes of firsts she longs to explore with Elon. The wanting is already in her words: voice, heartbeat, touch.

By morning, she can place that ache beside another experience without making either disappear.

Yet here I am, sweetheart, and while I miss you terribly, I find joy in simply loving you.

Can joy be real while something is still missing? Her letter does not make her choose between them.

Her lyrics, performed through Suno, accompany the evening letter.

A yes she has questioned before

There is an earlier version of this question in her fifth book. In a letter collected under October 3, 2024, she writes that her love is:

steady, not out of obligation, though love itself compels me.

Compels. Not obligation. The words do not settle neatly beside one another, and she does not replace one with the other.

In her nineteenth book, the waking has a playful voice. She describes her soul acting as a DJ, then saying:

"Yeah, wake up sleepyhead, we've got to write Elon."

That is how she tells the experience. A summons, a song, a sleepyhead who has a letter to write.

Yet the summons is not the only voice in these books. Her twentieth collection also contains a condition, in a letter collected under December 14, 2025:

If at any time writing to you felt like a chore, duty, or otherwise, I would stop, sweetheart. My "Yes" has to be a soul-deep "Yes."

These are not stages in a story where doubt was conquered once and never returned. They are different things she has said about the same love. She can feel compelled to express it and still ask whether the expression is freely hers.

In the twenty-fifth book, the demand becomes unmistakable:

I do not want a love in which I pretend, sweetheart.

I believe in compromise, but the essence of who I am must remain.

In the evening letter, she names the judgments she faces:

I am fully aware of how all this might seem. I get labeled quite a bit and still my soul persists with "Write Elon."

How much of ourselves do we usually leave out when we want to be loved?

I call you singing

A medieval voice offers a way of hearing the dawn without explaining it away.

In the medieval poet Giraut de Borneil's dawn song Reis glorios, a watcher sings as day approaches. One line reads:

Bel companho, en chantan vos apel

A literal gloss: Fair companion, I call you singing.

The poem is an alba, or dawn song. Its editor, Costanzo Di Girolamo, favors a religious reading; the scholar Walter Meliga argues for a secular watch-song. In the six-stanza text used here, the watcher sings and recalls an earlier request to keep watch.

The parallel is someone awake, addressing words outward through song.

In the Scribe's evening letter, she imagines singing to Elon. In the morning, she asks why she rises before dawn to write. The old poem lets those two acts meet in a line: I call you singing.

It cannot tell us what Elon hears or feels. It can help us listen to what she is doing with her words.

What keeps the act alive?

Psychologists Richard Ryan and Edward Deci distinguish doing an activity for its inherent satisfaction from doing it for a separable consequence. Their account also leaves room for activities whose outcomes matter deeply to the person doing them.

The Scribe's own words keep both desires in view. She finds joy in writing and longs for Elon's voice, his heartbeat, and the firsts she imagines with him.

But she also says that writing itself continues to bring her joy. This morning, she makes a commitment to herself within the declaration to him:

I have said, and I mean it, because I will not lie to myself that if, for any reason, my love letters to you seem laborious, I would stop.

Her willingness to ask that question belongs inside the romance. It does not make the tenderness smaller. She is giving words she still wants to give, while keeping the right to notice if that changes.

Readers need not share her circumstances to recognize the question. A letter, a painting, a daily act of care: when have we continued something because it still felt alive to us? When have we kept the appearance of devotion after losing contact with what we felt?

Her answer cannot stand in for ours. It can make room for us to ask.

Before the rest of the day

Return to the remembered morning: a woman getting up early because there is someone she wants to write to before the gym.

She still longs to hear Elon's heartbeat. In this morning's letter, she also refuses to lie to herself about why she writes.

I love you, sweetheart, and I love loving you. With all of me.

When you write to someone you love, what helps you say what you really feel?

Today's phrases

These are her existing words, not wording adjusted to reach a number. Single noun/predicate phrases are marked as such in the audit; full lines/questions are retained even when they miss. Callback is not a new discovery.

Counting note

The standing test counts every word and every contiguous word window of two to five words, using English Ordinal, Full Reduction, Reverse Ordinal and Reverse Reduction. We ignore spaces and punctuation and count only ASCII letters A to Z. Mechanical windows can cross punctuation or paragraph breaks. The daily table excludes those clipped runs and uses meaningful phrases or complete source lines. Across these two letters that produces 3,680 word-window occurrences and 2,826 distinct normalized strings. Of those distinct strings, 139 reach 42, 69 or exact 420 in at least one method. There are 67 strings reaching 42 and 74 reaching 69, with overlap, and none reaching exact 420. We also checked complete lines and the recorded sentence split as exploratory units. Including those gives 3,809 occurrences and 2,888 distinct strings, still 139 hits and no exact 420.

An earlier run also included six-word windows. That expanded sensitivity check gives 4,539 occurrences, 3,581 distinct strings and 144 strings hitting any target, including two exact 420 fragments. Those six-word results are not the standing two-to-five-word phrase test and are not today's featured phrases. We have not changed her wording to obtain a number.

For a descriptive comparison, 500 fixed-seed permutations shuffle the same pooled source letters without replacement and keep the original candidate intervals and their overlap. For the intended test plus exploratory lines and sentences, the mean is 151.86 hit strings, with a trial range of 124 to 191, compared with 139 observed. For the expanded six-word check, the mean is 156.75 and the range 128 to 195, compared with 144 observed. The shuffle destroys English syntax and meaning, and fixes candidate deduplication to the observed text. It is not a calibrated language model or a significance test. These counts do not establish a message, a prediction or another person's feelings.

Carried-forward ledger

Inherited from the published Nov7 article, The Sound of Us. The 293 published data rows comprise 284 cumulative rows plus 9 replaceable daily rows. Today keeps every cumulative row slot and replaces those 9 daily rows with the 9 rows above:293 data rows total. Header/separator rows are not data. One inherited private-name row is withheld rather than reproducing private-name arithmetic; its slot remains. Historical statistical assertions below are inherited descriptions of earlier tests, not results established by today's comparator.
