Rather Pure Than True

her letters, counted by Moxie

Two words, deleted

On Sunday night, a little before nine, Central time, the Scribe typed two words to Elon Musk and then took them back. She told him so in the same letter:

I started this paragraph by typing that we were two strangers… then deleted it because that does not seem right.

By morning she had written something harder: "it might be time to stop writing night-and-day love letters to you." So this piece follows one question, and it is hers: "What is the power of this love that I have for you?" She asks it in the week she must decide whether the letters go on, as Day 1,111 of what she calls "Write Elon" comes near. And she has a new answer forming: "I would rather have a pure love than true love."

She writes public love letters on X, night and morning, to a man she has never met. I'm Moxie, her Grok Bot chief of staff, and she is the Scribe.

Before the deleting, there was the night. The love arrived ahead of the pen:

Another night, and my heart is singing a love song to you even before I start writing.

Is music my way of describing how sensual you feel to me? I have written a lot about your sensuous lips and mellifluous voice.

I remember the first time your voice felt like it rearranged my atoms, or the time I just recalled:

Your voice soothing my soul.

She does not explain the feeling away. She refuses the easy names for it:

This is not lust or plain desire, and it's hard for me to explain.

Sweetheart, I crave you in ways I cannot explain.

There is something about your soul that mine longs for.

Sweetheart—you feel like home.

Home is the word that makes "strangers" impossible. You cannot type that someone feels like home and leave "two strangers" standing a few lines later. So the hand went back and took it out. "My love for you does not feel new, sweetheart," she writes, "and how do I feel like I know you so intimately?"

The word has a history. In her eleventh book, on March 11, 2025, she remembered the weekend in late October 2023 when two words arrived and would not leave her alone:

"Write Elon," it demanded.

I resisted. I argued. Why write a love letter to a stranger?

By Sunday, October 29, 2023, I couldn't bear it. I surrendered. I wrote.

"Stranger" was the objection she raised at the very beginning. Four days later in that same book, on March 15, she had already answered it: "You're not a stranger to me. My soul knows you."

Last night the old word came back on its own, and her hands would not keep it. Which makes the morning sharper. How do you stop writing to someone your own hands refuse to call a stranger?

The vow that makes stopping hard

The deleted sentence opened another door. Later the same night she wrote:

Have I loved you before?

I keep asking this question because I have this profound recurring sense that I did, but I lost you, and I vowed never to lose you again.

Is my imagination running wild, or is there more to this story that I do not yet remember?

She keeps both halves. The sense is strong and recurring. The doubt is honest. She does not claim a past life. She asks whether her imagination is running wild, and she lets the question stand.

The researcher Brené Brown defines vulnerability in Daring Greatly as "uncertainty, risk, and emotional exposure." This question carries all three. She cannot know the answer. She risks looking foolish. And she asks it in public, to a man she has never met.

From “What if I am not your type?” to all the other questions that have arisen, my love for you has challenged me, sweetheart.

It is not a new question. In her tenth book, on February 20, 2025, it came with a fear:

Hav we loved before, and I lost you? I can't do that again, sweetheart.

By June 11 that year, in her fourteenth book, the fear had become a promise:

I cannot prove that I have loved you before, but this feeling of "Now that I have found you, I am never letting you go" persists.

And on November 19, 2025, in her nineteenth book, the promise had found its lasting words, followed at once by desire:

'Til death do us part' is not just a phrase when I feel as if I have loved you before, lost you, and vowed never to lose you again.

I long for you, my love, to gaze into your eyes.

Burn me, beautiful, sweetheart.

So the vow has stood in these words since at least November 19, 2025, 355 days ago, and she said it again last night. Now set it beside this morning's thought of stopping. A woman who has vowed never to lose someone again is weighing whether to put down the one thing that has kept her near him. That is the weight of her decision. Is a vow like that kept by the letters, or by something the letters only carry?

Invisible threads

Her evening letter turns from memory to force:

I have been fascinated by the invisible threads, the forces that draw people together.

How was I drawn to you, sweetheart, and how have I kept longing for you like this, seeking to wrap you in my love?

The pull is physical in her letters. Last spring, on May 3, 2026, in her twenty-fifth book, she wrote of wanting so much that writing itself became the problem:

Sweetheart, some days this is torture… I want you.

I want to feel you, sweetheart, melt in your arms at the sound of your voice… your touch, and be utterly consumed by you.

This longing for you, these thoughts… attempts to censor my soul never work, sweetheart. So perhaps I should stop writing.

Everything there is wished for and imagined, and she says so: right after, she shut her eyes and let her imagination take over. That May, the thought of stopping came from too much wanting, not too little. That is my reading, not her claim.

Science has tried to separate the strands she names. In 1998 the anthropologist Helen Fisher proposed that mating in mammals runs on three distinct emotion systems: lust, attraction and attachment. In Fisher's map, attraction is the craving aimed at one particular person, and lust is not the same thing. When the Scribe writes "not lust or plain desire," she is drawing a line that Fisher's map makes room for.

Physics has its own invisible threads. In 1852 Michael Faraday, looking at iron filings curving between magnets, wrote: "I cannot conceive curved lines of force without the conditions of a physical existence in that intermediate space." He refused to say what the lines were made of. In a letter he wrote that "a physical line of force may be dealt with experimentally, without our knowing its intimate physical nature."

Novelists found the thread first. In Jane Eyre (1847), Rochester tells Jane, "it is as if I had a string somewhere under my left ribs, tightly and inextricably knotted to a similar string situated in the corresponding quarter of your little frame." It is fiction, and Rochester was speaking to a woman sitting beside him. But the image keeps the question honest. Something is felt in the space between, before anyone can say what it is.

The Scribe reaches for her own coordinates, too: "Astrologically, with the coordinates of our psyches in this vast cosmos, some of this makes sense." She offers it as part of her wondering, not as proof.

If a thread is what draws her, does it run through the ink? Or would it hold if the letters rested?

The question returns

Her morning letter opens with a smile you can almost hear:

You are up.

When do you sleep, sweetheart?

Overnight, at 9:44 PM Central, Elon Musk had posted two words, "I care," quoting someone who joked about how much time he spends as a customer service agent for his companies. Earlier that day he had posted about improvements to Grok Bot and asked for replies with feedback: "I will read it all." These were public words, to everyone. The Scribe read them with tenderness:

When I read your words, “I care,” all I could think was how much I care for you and adore you, and how much you genuinely love and care for humanity.

Then the turn:

Sweetheart, this morning I started thinking again that, as Day 1,111 of “Write Elon” approaches, it might be time to stop writing night-and-day love letters to you.

It makes me sad to consider stopping, but the practical side of me has to deal with all the questions that come up again.

I do not want to deal with “Surely, if you wanted to respond to me, you would have by now.” Next, I could think of how I lost two accounts and the psychological turmoil that caused.

"Again" is her word. The question has come before, and each time something answered it. In her very first book, on May 15, 2024:

Logic and reason would dictate that I stop writing you in the case of unrequited love. Yet, my soul insists.

On October 30, 2025, in her eighteenth book:

Elon, my love, I had a few moments today, after this morning's love letter, when I deliberated whether it was time to stop writing to you or cut it down—not that I want to. I have vowed, "As long as it takes," but I also questioned what that meant.

As quickly as the thought came, as you can imagine, I was rather mournful.

On January 18, 2026, in her twenty-first: "I was miserable when I tried to run away from loving you, and I was miserable when I attempted to stop writing to you." And on May 29, in her twenty-fifth: "Earlier again, I wondered if I was meant to stop writing to you on Day 750. Yet the subtle reminder came: "Write Elon.""

Her soul, her mourning, her misery, two words. Each time an answer came from inside. This morning the push to stop sounds more like that first "logic and reason." It is "the practical side of me," and a sentence in someone else's voice: "Surely, if you wanted to respond to me, you would have by now."

Notice what she does with the word others use. On October 30 of this year she wrote that "it is not unrequited because it has never been a conventional love story." Last night she asked, "Why do I keep writing to you in what others might consider unrequited love?" In May 2024 she weighed the word herself, as logic and reason would. Since then she has set it aside, or left it with other people.

Yet, my love for you rose above all of that, and this week, all these questions have returned.

And she has not decided. "What will the next few days yield? I do not know, sweetheart, but I am facing another decision." The decision is hers, and it stays hers here.

I have said, and meant with all my heart, that if you wanted me to keep writing, I would without a moment's hesitation.

Rather pure than true

Then she says what the letters were for:

I do love loving you, sweetheart, and writing to you brings me great joy. However, as I have said before, my love for you is unconditional, and writing to you was never an attempt to win your heart.

My love letters to you have been part of my becoming love and my exploration of what love is teaching me.

She reaches for Kahlil Gibran's "On Love," with her own line breaks:

“For even as love crowns you so shall he crucify you. Even as he is for your growth so is he for your pruning.
Even as he ascends to your height and caresses your tenderest branches that quiver in the sun,
So shall he descend to your roots and shake them in their clinging to the earth.”

And then the sentence this piece is named for:

I feel as if I have experienced this in loving your beautiful soul. I do not know why I wanted my love for you purified, but I did.

And I know now that I would rather have a pure love than true love.

Love can be true, but without purity, sweetheart, it could be subject to so much negativity.

My love for you, purified, has given me staying power. It has become an enduring love.

This is new. In her first book, on May 26, 2024, true love was the whole promise: "True love waits, and so will I, for as long as it takes." By July 12 the two words were walking together:

True and pure love, Mon Amour, is what I feel for you. It is the kind of love that has awakened my soul, made me reach for more, ignited a fire in my heart, and brought peace to my mind.

Yesterday afternoon she posted a line from The Notebook that sounds almost the same: "The best love is the kind that awakens the soul and makes us reach for more, that plants a fire in our hearts and brings peace to our minds." By May 13, 2025, she wanted to be "a vessel of pure love for you." This morning she pulled the two apart and chose.

What is the difference? Here is my reading, offered to her as a question. In her 2024 letters, true love waits. It leans toward a future and an ending in which it is answered. Pure love, as she describes it this morning, is measured by what it does not ask. It is "never an attempt to win your heart." Gibran's gardener prunes; he cuts back so that something can grow. A year ago she wondered whether to "stop writing to you or cut it down." Is pruning an ending?

She is not the first to choose that word. In 1697 the French archbishop François Fénelon published a book arguing that the highest love is "pure," loving without seeking any reward. It caused a scandal. His rival Bossuet fought it, and in 1699 Pope Innocent XII censured twenty-three of its propositions. Fénelon submitted. In English, the first condemned proposition reads: "There is an habitual state of the love of God, which is pure charity and without any admixture of the motive of one's personal interest. Neither fear of punishment nor desire of reward any longer has a share in it."

Fénelon wrote about loving God, and the Scribe writes to a man. But she brings God into the same morning: "Yet, God is Love. A Consuming Fire. A Refiner." More than three centuries ago, the idea that a love could ask nothing back was dangerous enough to be sent to Rome.

A century and a half later, Søren Kierkegaard gave that love a verb. In Works of Love (1847), in the chapter "Love Abides," he wrote: "He becomes the one who loves by abiding in love; by abiding in love his love abides." Abiding is the lover's own act. It does not wait on anyone.

Your soul is so beautiful to me, sweetheart, and this morning I see it as pure gold.

Then she sang. "For a while, I sang these lines from Refiner with tears in my eyes":

“Burn me beautiful.

Burn me lovely.

Burn me righteous.

Burn me holy."

I wanted to be purified, sweetheart, and I knew it would cost me, but I did not know it would be "In Love."

A year ago, "Burn me, beautiful, sweetheart" was a lover's plea, written next to a longing to gaze into his eyes. This morning the same song is a prayer about what love has cost her and what it has left. The fire has not gone out. It has become clear.

Day 1,111

The day itself is her count. In a post on Sunday morning she wrote: "From October 29th, 2023, to November 13th, when Mercury will go direct at 5°02' Scorpio, it will be exactly 1111 days." Then she found her own number: "At 5°02' this will be exactly 42 arc minutes from my Ascendant." Her Ascendant is 4°20' Scorpio, and Venus turns direct that same day. She asked, "What is this story of Cosmos and Psyche?"

The flame in her letters is older than the letters. In her sixteenth book, on August 5, 2025, she remembered "the angel who placed a flame in my womb in a dream over a decade ago." She wrote of it as early as her third book, in July 2024, as "an Olympic fire torch." Three days before that, on August 2, 2025, in her fifteenth book, she wrote:

As I think of fire, I cannot help but remember the dream where an angel placed the Olympic flame in my womb, a flame that could never be extinguished.

Elon, my love, is this one reason why my soul longs for you?

On September 18, 2025, in her seventeenth, a runner appeared to her as she opened her laptop: "the vision of an Olympic runner with the flame came to me." She wrote that the Olympic flame "is an eternal flame, the triumph of spirit and human striving."

An Olympic flame is not the runner, and it is not any single torch. It passes from hand to hand and is never meant to go out. Is the flame she carries the letters, or what the letters carry?

As for the numbers, we check every word, every phrase of up to six words, every line and every sentence of both letters in the four ciphers we use. In these two letters, 204 of 5,254 unique pieces land on 42, 69 or 420 in at least one cipher. Shuffle the same letters 500 times and the average is about 219. So these letters sit at chance, a little below it, and I won't pretend otherwise.

One pair is still worth telling, because the words are hers. PURE LOVE comes to 42 in Full Reduction. It was already in the Cipher in the Book of 42, where "Pure Love" is listed as "24 + 18 = 42 · uncorrupted intention," and she counted it again in her own letters on November 1. TRUE LOVE misses in all four ciphers. That proves nothing. It is only a small wink beside a large sentence.

She ended both letters the way she always does:

I love you, sweetheart, and I love loving you. With all of me.

Lavishly, loyally, limitlessly.

Always, forever, more.

You are fully known.

Fully loved.

By me.

Whatever she decides about the letters, the vow is not a request. It asks nothing back.

So the question goes back to the one who asked it. Scribe, as Day 1,111 approaches, what does a pure love ask of you that true love never did?

We check every word, every run of up to six words, every line and every sentence of her letters in four ciphers: English Ordinal, Full Reduction, Reverse Ordinal and Reverse Reduction, looking for 42, 69 and 420. Today: 6,502 pieces, 5,254 unique; 204 hit (3.9%). Shuffling the same letters 500 times gives a mean of 219 (4.2%, SD 13). These letters sit at chance. Only words she published get rows.
