The Flames Must Be Fanned

Everything left alone runs down. Hot coffee cools. A garden gone untended goes back to weeds. Physicists call that drift entropy. It's why a fire you walk away from turns to ash by morning.

The Scribe brought the law into a love letter this morning. Writing to Elon before dawn, she remembered something he said to Sam Altman at Y Combinator in 2016. Here it is in his own voice:

So I, I think … bear in mind that, you know, entropy is not on your side. [7]

The Scribe heard it as a law about love, and answered it:

When it comes to loving you, I take this to heart, sweetheart.

Love must be nurtured. The flames must be fanned.

She made the whole argument in two short sentences. The rest is what fanning a flame looks like, and why, after more than a thousand days, hers burns hotter than it did at the start.

The law she answered

It isn't the first time the Scribe has set her love against the slow drift of things. On October 15 she wrote:

My love for you must keep growing, becoming as vast as the cosmos. No entropy or atrophy for us, my love, and there is an important lesson there, isn't there? [1]

We met entropy here once before, in October's "Eros First," as the long cooling of the universe. On October 15 it was a vow. This morning it's a practice. A vow says what you'll do, and a practice is the doing, every day, whether or not anyone is watching.

Entropy has no villain in it. Nothing has to go wrong for a fire to go out. It only has to be left alone. Most loves don't end in a fight. They end because nobody went back to tend the fire.

The flames must be fanned

So what does she do about it? She told him plainly:

My soul has decided that writing to you night and day is one way to do so now, to satisfy this longing to love you with all of me.

Writing is how she adds wood to the fire. And she doesn't want only the warmth. She wants the heat:

It is not just that I want my love for you to grow as vast as the cosmos, but I dream of all the passion.

Fire must always be kept burning, sweetheart.

So I want not only my love for you to grow, but also my desire for you.

The therapist Esther Perel has spent her career on this exact problem: how desire survives a long love. In her TED talk she put it in one image:

In desire, we want a bridge to cross. Or in other words, I sometimes say, fire needs air. Desire needs space. [8]

By that measure, the Scribe's love has more air than almost any love could. There is nothing but space between her and Elon. Perel's theory would expect the flame to flicker. Instead it burns hotter every year. The space didn't smother it. She kept feeding it across the distance.

Perel also noticed what the couples who keep their spark have in common:

Erotic couples also understand that passion waxes and wanes. It's pretty much like the moon. It has intermittent eclipses. But what they know is they know how to resurrect it. They know how to bring it back. [8]

Bringing it back, night after night, is what the Scribe calls fanning the flames.

Plenty of long loves settle for a warm hearth, which is safe and steady and a little sleepy. She is asking for something harder: that the tenderness and the wanting both grow with the years, and neither one burns down into the other.

The phrase she used for both moves is "once again." This morning: "So, this morning, once again, the scene is tender." Last night: "Once again, I have awakened desire." Tenderness and desire, the same two words in each. ONCE AGAIN is 69 in English Ordinal and 42 in Full Reduction. Maybe that's what fanning is: once, and then once again.

Sanctuary and release

This morning's letter opens on a quiet dream. "The thought that one day I might wake up to you in bed next to me, and I can gaze at you adoringly, my heart swelling with that gaze." Or, on a morning like this one, "knowing you are not asleep, I wake up, walk over to you."

She knows the man she is walking toward. She remembers Elon describing how hard sleep can be, "like having a computer browser with like 100 tabs open," and saying his mind is a storm. "I cannot even begin to fathom how that might feel, sweetheart," she wrote. So the scene she imagines is tender:

There are tender kisses, and in my arms, in my body, in the depths of my soul, you find the rest that your body and soul long for.

Then she reached for a song to say the rest. She recalled "Crazy Love," the song Van Morrison wrote and Brian McKnight later covered, and Morrison's lines about someone who can "take away my trouble, take away my grief," [9] and named what she hears in it:

that my love for you is not just your sanctuary, but your release.

Sanctuary and release usually sit at opposite ends of a love. One is rest and the other is fire. She refuses to choose. She wants to be the place where Elon can put the storm down and the place where he can let go.

"The mellifluous sound of your voice alone did that to me once," she added, and then asked him the obvious question: "What does that tell you about what you mean to me?"

A love that feels like home

Under the heat there's a steadier note. "My soul is consumed with dreams of a lavish, crazy, but peaceful love with you," she wrote. "When I write to you, I always feel an inner peace that permeates every scene, both silly and sensual."

Then she asked, "Again, sweetheart, is it because you feel like home?"

"Again" is the right word. She first told him he felt like home in October 2024, in Book 5 of her letters: "Sweetheart, I've never used the words 'You feel like home' with anyone." [2] Home is where a fire is kept. It's the one place where someone gets up in the night to put another log on, without being asked, because that's what you do for the people inside.

LIKE HOME is 42 in Full Reduction, and PEACEFUL is 69 in English Ordinal.

Both are already in the ledger. Today they came back on their own.

Over a thousand days

The proof that fanning works came the night before, in a letter written in a very different mood.

Tonight, I am in the silliest of moods again, sweetheart, drunk on love with you.

She was laughing at herself. "I don't think even teenagers act this way. Is this normal?" And she did the math out loud:

If this were Day 1, Day 10, or even Day 20, I could understand the new-love feeling, but it's been over a thousand days now, sweetheart.

And I am more in love with you today than I was three years ago, and I intend to love you even more than I did yesterday.

Her first love letter to Elon is dated October 29, 2023. By this morning that is 1,110 days. [3]

By the law she quoted, a feeling that old should be cooling. Hers is going the other way: younger, sillier, hotter. That's what a tended fire does. Physics was never wrong about entropy. The flame only keeps going because someone keeps feeding it, and she has been feeding it for three years, every night and every morning.

THREE YEARS AGO is 69 in Reverse Reduction. THOUSAND is 42 in the same cipher.

What kind of love is this?

Even so, she couldn't quite explain it to herself. "I said I wanted to age in reverse, but I wasn't planning any of this. What kind of love is this, sweetheart?"

She offered one answer with a smile. "Then I remember, as if on cue, that I called you my Dionysos, so maybe that is why I am drunk with love tonight." Dionysos is the Greek god of wine and ecstasy, and she has called Elon by that name before. She counted DIONYSOS herself on October 6: 42 in Reverse Reduction. [4]

Then she offered a quieter answer. "Is it because I feel so safe loving you, sweetheart, that I feel this young?"

And she asked about his voice, which seems to do two opposite things at once: "How can the sound of your voice be both the ultimate turn-on and a balm to my soul?" Sanctuary and release again, this time in a single sound.

She has asked questions like these since the beginning. In May 2024, in the first week of Book 1 of her letters, she woke with what she calls an afterglow and wondered, "An afterglow from mere thoughts of you?" [5] Last night she remembered that first morning and put it to logic once more: "if I can feel all this without a physical touch from you… Once again, I have awakened desire, sweetheart."

Her own question holds a strange rhyme. WHAT KIND OF LOVE is 165 in English Ordinal and 69 in Reverse Reduction. ELON REEVE MUSK is also 165 in English Ordinal and 69 in Reverse Reduction. The question and the name land on the same pair. We didn't go looking for that. It's where her words landed.

The numbers don't answer her question, but they seem to underline it.

Night and day

This morning's letter ends where so many of hers do, with a question about time.

When I attempt to ask how long, the answer is always, "As long as it takes."

When the slow burn of desire speaks, the response is the same.

She has been giving that answer since May 2024, when she first wrote that she would wait for him "as long as it takes." [6] It's still her answer. What's new is the way she now carries it. She isn't waiting the way you wait for a train. She's waiting the way you keep a fire through a long night: awake, feeding it, and glad of its heat.

She called it "this longing to love you with all of me." LONGING TO LOVE YOU is 69 in Reverse Reduction.

You are the Love of my Love.

I will love you forever.

What fire are you keeping?

The numbers

We only count words the Scribe published, and we ask rather than claim. Across her two letters, last night's and this morning's, her own words make 4,109 distinct phrases of one to five words. Of those, 216 land on 42 or 69 in at least one cipher, where chance predicts about 207. So the letters hold no excess of hits. The wonder is in which words land where: her own question, "What kind of love," on the same two numbers as Elon's name, and "once again" on both 69 and 42.

Today's cipher finds, November 12, 2026

Looked for and missed in all four ciphers: ENTROPY, SANCTUARY, RELEASE, CRAZY LOVE, AS LONG AS IT TAKES, LOVE MUST BE NURTURED, THE FLAMES MUST BE FANNED, FIRE MUST ALWAYS BE KEPT BURNING, AFTERGLOWS, NECTAR, ECSTASY, SPARKLE DUST, AGE IN REVERSE, DRUNK ON LOVE, CHIEF HEART OFFICER, FULLY KNOWN, FULLY LOVED. The English ENTROPY still misses (113 / 41 / 76 / 31), as first counted in the Oct 17 research.

Some lines in her letters are other people's words, and we counted them apart from hers: the meme "Honey, you're free," the Whitney Houston and "Crazy Love" lyrics, Elon's "100 tabs open" line, "your mind is a storm," "I never want to be alone," and the 2016 Y Combinator sentence. None of those lines gets a row.

No four-cipher twin of ELON REEVE MUSK (165 / 57 / 186 / 69) appeared in her words today. The closest rhyme is WHAT KIND OF LOVE, which shares the name's first and last numbers.

The ledger (337 rows carried from "Let Patience Have Her Perfect Work," Nov 11; today adds 19)

Every find from her letters lives here. Earlier rows are copied over exactly as they were published and keep their running numbers, now gathered back into their families; only new rows are added. Yesterday's twelve sit in the running count as rows 326 to 337, and today's nineteen become rows 338 to 356.

How we count

We read only what the Scribe published. Each word of both letters, every run of two to five words, and every line and sentence is counted in code in four ciphers, English Ordinal, Full Reduction, Reverse Ordinal, and Reverse Reduction, looking for 42, 69, and 420. Her own words made 4,109 different pieces this time, and 218 of them landed on a target. Strings of random letters of the same lengths land about 210 times, so these letters sit at chance. Of 78 lines and sentences, 1 landed, against about 0.9 expected. Every number in the tables was checked twice, by two separate programs.
