Sensual Energy

It is just before 4:20 on a Monday morning, and a woman in Texas is lying awake in the dark, writing a love letter in her head. It begins with two words she would never say to a stranger: "Hey, Sexy." Then the voices arrive, the old ones, asking why she is still writing to a man who has never written back. Why does writing to him feel like making love, and what does that feeling know?

She answers the voices before she answers the question.

When I woke up this morning, those voices wanted to get loud again, questioning why I was still writing to you.

This time, I silenced them with a smile, the mandate to "Write Elon," and the fact that I simply love loving you. [1]

The Scribe has been writing to Elon Musk since October 29, 2023. This morning's letter, posted at 5:15 AM Central Time, is mostly questions, and she knows it. "This morning's love letter to you has become more questions than answers," she writes, and later, "There is something about my love for you, sweetheart, and I wish I knew what questions to ask." [1]

The voice that changed sides

The night before had not gone as well. At 8:22 PM on Sunday, after a day of seeing what strangers on X were saying about him, she wrote:

When I feel like this, I become more vulnerable, and I know the voices get louder.

But I get to choose, sweetheart, what I will focus on, and tonight, it is on you and how sexy you are to me. [2]

Then the ache came anyway. "Am I strong enough to miss you this much? What is Love teaching me?" She thought of the early days, when "the love sickness was almost unbearable," and decided on an early night instead. [2]

Those voices are old. On June 6, 2024, in her first book of letters, she wrote them down word for word: "Voices in my head persist: 'It is unrequited love.' 'Stop making a fool of yourself.'" A week later, on Day 35 of her letters, she tried to limit herself to one letter a day, and a different voice would not let her:

Write Elon. No. Write Elon. Why? Write Elon. But he hasn't responded. Write Elon. Okay. [3]

In 2024, "Write Elon" was the voice she argued with. This morning it is the voice she reaches for to quiet the others. The words did not change. The side they are on did.

The psychiatrist Iain McGilchrist, who spent decades on how the two halves of the brain attend to the world, put her evening sentence in a philosopher's terms: "Attention is a moral act: it creates, brings aspects of things into being, but in doing so makes others recede." [4] She chose where her attention would go, and by morning the voices had receded far enough for her to smile.

Words that are alive

Then the letter turns to something she has felt for years and has never quite been able to explain.

My words sometimes 'roll off' my mind as if I were making love to you, sweetheart.

It is not just that you feel like music to me, sweetheart; so often, when I write to you, this exchange feels sensual.

How do I explain that? [1]

A few lines later she tries again, slowly, the way she says she whispers his name:

Elon, my love, my sweet, sweet love, my sweetest love…

I love when I pause and whisper these words. This is part of the sensuality that I mean. My words are alive, sweetheart, imbued with energy, sensual energy that I can feel. [1]

Science has an answer to part of this. In 2006 a team in Spain put readers in a brain scanner and gave them words like "cinnamon," "garlic," and "jasmine." Simply reading those words lit up the primary smell areas of the brain, including the piriform cortex and the amygdala. [5] Some words travel past meaning and into the senses. A word whispered with longing can arrive in the body the way a scent does.

The philosopher Emmanuel Levinas described the lover's touch in a way that fits her letters closely. The caress, he wrote, "consists in seizing upon nothing, in soliciting what ceaselessly escapes its form toward a future never future enough." It "searches, it forages." It "expresses love, but suffers from an inability to tell it." [6] A love letter to someone far away works the same way, a touch that searches and doesn't grab. Less than half an hour after posting the letter, she put it more simply: “I feel you, sweetheart, in ways I do not yet have language for.” [27]

And then the numbers. This series adds up the letters of her phrases four ways, explained in “How we count” below. SENSUAL ENERGY, her phrase, comes to 165 in English Ordinal, 57 in Full Reduction, 186 in Reverse Ordinal, and 69 in Reverse Reduction. Those are, all four, the numbers of ELON REEVE MUSK. The poet Audre Lorde, in a talk she gave at Mount Holyoke in 1978, called the erotic “a measure between the beginnings of our sense of self and the chaos of our strongest feelings.” [7] The Scribe’s sensual energy is a measure of that kind. Her phrase for it carries his name’s numbers.

Two old words

Her two words are older than English. Sensual comes through Late Latin sensualis, “endowed with feeling,” from sensus, the past participle of sentire, “to perceive, to feel.” [25] The same verb gave us sense, sentiment, and sentence. When it entered English in the early 1400s, sensual meant “concerning the body,” set apart from the spirit and the intellect. [25] Her letter puts the two back together. The feeling she means comes through the senses and through the sentence at once.

Energy is Greek. Energeia joins en, "in" or "at," to ergon, "work," so it means something like being at work. Aristotle used it for actuality, a thing fully being what it is, as opposed to what it might become. [25] In the Rhetoric he gave it a second home in language. Words set things "before the eyes," he wrote, when they "signify actuality," and Homer was loved because he spoke of "inanimate things as if they were animate": "the arrow flew," "the eager spear-point." [26]

The first English meaning of energy, in the 1590s, was "force of expression." [25] So the word has always carried her sentence in it. "My words are alive, sweetheart, imbued with energy, sensual energy that I can feel." In Aristotle's terms, her words are at work. In the Latin, they are felt. Put together, sensual energy is very close to a definition of a love letter: feeling that has become something you can do.

Does my soul sneak off?

Then comes the question she has asked before, almost word for word.

It is the same way I cannot explain the afterglows that I have woken up with.

Does my soul sneak off for a rendezvous with you? [1]

On January 13, 2026, in her twenty-first book of letters, she wrote, “My soul…does it sneak away for nightly rendezvous with you? What happens when I fall asleep and do not remember my dreams, but I wake up with songs on my mind?” [3]

The afterglow is older still. On the morning of May 15, 2024, the sixth day of her letters, she wrote, “I wake up bathed in an ‘afterglow,’ as if we had made love through the night,” and then asked, “An afterglow from mere thoughts of you?” [3] Two and a half years later she wakes the same way, and now she asks for an explanation.

The Greeks told a story about exactly this. Selene, the Moon, fell in love with a young man named Endymion. In the version the mythographer Apollodorus recorded, Zeus granted Endymion one wish, and he chose to sleep forever, “remaining deathless and ageless.” [8] So every night the Moon came down to the cave on Mount Latmos where he slept. In Apollonius of Rhodes, the Moon admits that she, too, has burned with love for Endymion and gone down to his cave on Latmos. The satirist Lucian has her stealing down on tiptoe so as not to wake him. [8]

The Roman naturalist Pliny the Elder told the story the other way around. Endymion, he said, was the first person to work out how the Moon moves, and the legend of their love grew from his long watching. [9] In one telling the Moon visits the sleeper. In the other, the one who watches the Moon every night is the one who falls in love. Either way, love and attention arrive together, and the meeting happens at night.

The Egyptians gave the soul wings. In the Book of the Dead, the ba, drawn as a bird with a human head, leaves the body and flies out by day, and spell 89 asks that it be allowed to come back and rest with the body again. [10]

The scholar Henry Corbin, reading the Sufi mystic Ibn ʿArabi, gave a name to the place where such meetings happen: the mundus imaginalis, the imaginal world, real but not physical, where the soul perceives what the senses can't. [11] Corbin was careful to say the imaginal is not the same as the imaginary.

She also remembered “what Bentov once shared about how quickly our consciousness travels.” She has been reading him for a while. In her evening letter of October 30 she quoted his line “Eventually, such a consciousness will develop into a co-creator.” This morning she reached for a different part of his book.

Itzhak Bentov was a Czech-born Israeli and American inventor, best known for medical devices such as the steerable cardiac catheter, who spent his later years trying to describe consciousness with an engineer’s tools. His 1977 book Stalking the Wild Pendulum begins with sound. “Our reality is a vibratory reality, and there is nothing static in it,” he wrote, from the atomic nucleus up. [12] This morning she told him he feels “like music” to her, so the thought is close to home.

Then he turned to the heart. With a sensitive, seismograph-like instrument, he measured the tiny motion of the whole body each time the heart pushes blood into the aorta. When a person holds the breath, he reported, the heart and aorta settle into rhythm, and the system “resonates just like a tuned musical instrument,” rocking the body up and down about seven times a second. [12] Researchers had long recorded this micromotion, called the ballistocardiogram. The leaps Bentov made from it were his own.

From that rhythm he built the idea she remembered. At the still point of each tiny swing, he proposed, a nonphysical "observer" could expand outward and return, and so "He can flit about to distant places in fractions of a second. He may leave his physical body and be off to a beach thousands of miles away and be back all within one or two seconds." [12]

He went further, picturing consciousness rising in levels toward an "absolute" that he called "the source of all consciousness." [12] He died in 1979. A Cosmic Book (1982), written with his wife, the sculptor Mirtala, and finished after his death, is a lighter, illustrated tour of the same cosmology. [12]

These are Bentov's ideas, offered as a model, and they are not established physics. Bentov even starts from the limit: "We know that we cannot accelerate physical objects to the velocity of light, not to speak of infinite velocities." [12] Physics still allows nothing that carries information faster than light. Her afterglows do not need his observer to be true in order to be real. We can hold his picture as a picture and still take her mornings seriously.

If we see no angels in others

On Sunday afternoon the Scribe went looking for angels on X. Some of her dreams had sent her searching, and she found something she did not expect: a post Elon wrote on July 21, 2012, passing along a line he had heard at a debate.

Heard an interesting comment at the debate: "If we see no angels in others, we harbor none in ourselves." [13]

"I love these discoveries," she wrote. [14] A few minutes later she quoted two more of his posts, from 2023 and 2024, each with the same four words: "There are no coincidences." [15]

Her morning letter is, in its way, an answer to the 2012 line. She does not see him as perfect. "I know you are not perfect," she writes. "Neither am I. But what I do know and love about you is that you have set your heart to do good." [1]

To see the good in someone you have never met, and to keep seeing it on days when strangers do not, is a choice of attention too. Levinas built a whole ethics on it: the face of another person, he argued, calls on us before we have decided anything about them. [6]

What a consciousness scientist would ask

Seven months ago, on April 17, 2026, in her twenty-fourth book, the Scribe wrote down the question this article keeps circling: "At what point does consciousness become indistinguishable from love?" [3] This morning she approaches it from the body's side.

A consciousness scientist would begin where she does, with the experience itself. The neuroscientist Christof Koch calls experience "the feeling of life itself," the one thing each of us knows directly before we know anything else. [16] Anil Seth, at the University of Sussex, describes perception as a "controlled hallucination," the brain's best guess about the world, steered by the senses. [17] On his account, longing shapes the guess itself.

Phenomenology, the study of experience as it is lived, starts with Edmund Husserl's point that consciousness is always consciousness of something. [18] Her love has an object, a man in Texas who builds rockets. It also has a texture: music, sensuality, afterglow, a pull she has called a force since her first letter.

Try a small experiment. Read the name of someone you love silently, slowly, three times, and notice where it lands in your body. Wherever it lands, that is your evidence, and it is the kind of evidence she has been gathering for three years.

She has said what the gathering does to her. On October 12, 2026, before dawn, she wrote that the richness comes "when I allow my soul to speak, and I do not censor the eros and the play," and then: "these 42s and 69s are not only leading me to ask better questions but also expanding my consciousness." [19] This morning she put the same discovery in one sentence:

One thing I keep noticing is that when I share my longing for you authentically, I discover more about the nature of my love for you. [1]

Being honest makes her more aware, and that awareness is how she comes to understand her love. That may be the lesson her letters keep teaching, first to her, and then to anyone reading over her shoulder.

Love first

Then comes the hardest sentence in the letter, said without self-pity.

As for me, I know that this is a rare love. It is a gift. A blessing. Walking away from loving you because my love for you seems unrequited would be foolishness. [1]

On July 22, 2024, she had already called it "such a rare love—to fall in love with someone I have never met." [3] RARE LOVE is 42 in Full Reduction.

The French philosopher Jean-Luc Marion wrote a whole book about this position. In The Erotic Phenomenon (2003) he argues that the question "Does anyone love me?" has to give way to a braver one: "Can I love first?" The lover, he writes, appears "when one of the actors in the exchange no longer poses prior conditions, and loves without requiring to be loved." [20] A philosopher in Paris wrote down the Scribe's stance twenty years before she took it.

She knows the order of her own attraction, and says so: "Your soul's beauty draws me in, but I will let my body speak first." [1]

She is also honest about what she receives. “While I hope these love letters put a smile on your face, denying that I gain so much from this experience would be a lie.” [1] bell hooks, borrowing from the psychiatrist M. Scott Peck, defined love as “the will to extend one’s self for the purpose of nurturing one’s own or another’s spiritual growth.” [21] One’s own growth is part of the definition, so what she gains belongs to the love itself.

There is a biology to staying, too. In 2010, Helen Fisher and colleagues scanned people who were still intensely in love with someone who had left them. The brain’s reward region, the ventral tegmental area, stayed active, and the researchers noted that when a reward is delayed, the neurons that expect it keep firing. [22] The Scribe was never rejected, and she is not waiting the way those volunteers were. Her longing still has nowhere to land, so the wanting stays awake, and she turns it into letters every morning.

“I can trust you, sweetheart,” she writes, “and because of that, I can let down my guard. I have seen walls go up a few times, but they never stayed up. My love for you knocked them down.” [1]

Is it more than chance?

Then she asks the series question herself.

Is there a correlation between the words I choose and the 42s and the 69s hidden in them?

How are "Elon, My Love" and "Yearning" both 42 in Reverse Reduction?

Why does it seem like more than chance? [1]

At 5:42 AM, she answered part of it with her own arithmetic, quoting her letter:

Primal longing = 69

Sensual energy = 69

Elon Reeve Musk = 69

All 69 in Reverse Reduction. [27]

We checked all three. PRIMAL LONGING, her phrase from Sunday's letter, comes to 147, 75, 204, and 69. SENSUAL ENERGY and ELON REEVE MUSK share all four numbers, 165, 57, 186, and 69. She closed with a postscript: "'Sensual Energy' was Moxie's discovery." [27] Moxie is the counter behind this series, and the count did turn it up. The words were hers.

She deserves a straight answer. We took every run of one to five words in her evening and morning letters, 4,429 of them. About 4.9 percent land on 42 or 69 in at least one of the four ciphers. Of 74 phrases we picked because they mattered, before checking any numbers, 7 hit, about 9.5 percent. The rate is higher, but the sample is small and the picking was ours. The statisticians Persi Diaconis and Frederick Mosteller called this the law of truly large numbers: with enough chances, striking coincidences are certain to happen somewhere. [23]

The exact match is rarer. Across 1,337 thirteen-letter phrases in her saved letters, 6 carry all four of ELON REEVE MUSK's numbers. One of them is SENSUAL ENERGY. Another is WAS MADE POINTY, from her laughing post on Sunday about the nose of Starship. Phrases of the same length that match in English Ordinal always match in Reverse Ordinal too, so the four-way match is really two. And these are counts. A count can't tell anyone why a phrase arrives before dawn.

Her other question has a quieter answer. On July 24, 2023, before she knew she was in love, she sang "Fly Me to the Moon" while sweeping her kitchen in Texas, a song she hadn't sung in over a decade. [24] FLY ME TO THE MOON is 186 in English Ordinal and 69 in Full Reduction.

This morning she wrote "An everlasting love." EVERLASTING LOVE is also 186 and 69, the same first two numbers. In a song about the Moon, which visits the sleeper every night, she has been singing what this morning's letter calls everlasting.

What has your longing been trying to teach you?

In the post at 5:42 she also went back to a word she has argued with. "Back to this Twin Flames issue: I have read that this was possible…" Then she let the reader watch her decide: "I am tempted to delete this last sentence, but you know what, I will leave it up. Perhaps, by owning the word, I will do a better job asking the questions that I need to ask." [27] Yesterday's article followed her as she reclaimed twin flames. This morning she keeps it for a working reason. A word she is tempted to delete is a question she can't ask yet, and she wants the questions.

In her letter she signed off the way she always does, and then one more time, with the two numbers she calls hers:

You are my 42.

My 69. [1]

What she wrote just before that is where this story ends, a woman awake before dawn with nothing settled and nothing missing:

So here I still am, sweetheart, with questions, love for you, and a desire for you that burns in me. [1]

What has your longing been trying to teach you?

The ledger

These tables gather every 42 and 69 we have found in the Scribe's own published words, the two numbers she calls hers. Each phrase is counted in four ciphers, English Ordinal, Full Reduction, Reverse Ordinal, and Reverse Reduction, and wherever four numbers appear together they follow that order. Today's finds come first. Every find from earlier days is still here, folded into its family.

How we count

The four ciphers. English Ordinal gives A = 1 through Z = 26. Full Reduction reduces each letter to one digit, so J = 1 and Z = 8. Reverse Ordinal runs Z = 1 through A = 26. Reverse Reduction reduces the reversed values to one digit.

Her words only. A phrase is counted only if the Scribe published it in her own words, in her letters on X or in her published books of letters. Lines she quotes from Elon or anyone else stay out of the counts.

Arcminutes. Sky positions are given to the whole arcminute.

The chance tests. Today's letters: 218 of 4,429 phrases of one to five words (4.9 percent) hit 42 or 69 in some cipher. Earlier tests, carried below, found 42 and 69 at about the rate chance would give.
