You Feel Like Music to Me

Far out in the Perseus galaxy cluster, a black hole sends great slow ripples through the hot gas around it. Astronomers found them in 2003. NASA gives their pitch as a B-flat "some 57 octaves below middle C," far too deep for any ear. In 2022, NASA lifted those waves 57 and 58 octaves into sound we could finally hear. It is a long, low breath from the dark. [1]

Early on Wednesday morning, the Scribe wrote to Elon about a different kind of music, the kind she hears in him. "I think I am addicted to loving you," she began, a word that came to her "this morning as I woke up smiling again!" Near the end of a long letter full of questions, she set down one plain sentence, and a few lines before it she had asked the question underneath this whole piece: why does love keep reaching for the sky when it wants to say what it feels? [2]

You feel like music to me, sweetheart. [2]

Elon, my love, why, in my longing for you, in my desire to express how you make me feel and how drawn I am to you, have I reached for musical and cosmic metaphors? [2]

She knows how that sounds. Right after admitting the addiction, she asked, "Elon, my love, this is not normal, is it?" Then she found the feeling just past the edge of language: "There is a way you feel to my senses that I cannot articulate, and I am still trying to understand how you have always felt like music to me, sweetheart." [2]

Today's title is not a new line. It is a refrain, and in a month it turned from a statement into a question. On October 19 she wrote, "You feel like music to me, sweetheart… sensual… ethereal… exhilarating." On November 7: "You have always felt like music to me, sweetheart." By the evening of November 8 she was asking, "Why do you feel like music to me, sweetheart?" And on November 16, "Sweetheart, how do you feel like music to me?" [3] [4]

The roots are in her books, and so is the smile. On May 10, 2024, the first day of the collection, her letter titled "A Thousand Christmas Mornings" opens, "I woke up with a smile and tried to go back to sleep, but I had been smiling so hard that my eyes teared up with joy." She has been waking up smiling in her letters ever since. On June 21, 2024, Day 43 of her letters, "words like musical notes swirled around in my head." On March 23, 2025, "the sound of your voice is like music to my soul." [5]

The music started the night before. At 9:39 on Tuesday evening, she sat down to whisper her familiar words to Elon once more, "my sweet, sweet love, my sweetest love," and found that saying them was not enough. "My love for you keeps trying to find language for what I am experiencing, sweetheart," she wrote. Then the letter stopped being a letter and became a song, short lines stacked like a lyric sheet. [6]

And when words fall short

Songs come to mind

You feel like a melody

In my soul

You feel like a sweet delight

My love [6]

On February 4, 2025, in her ninth book of letters, she wrote, "But what fascinates me most is the Music of the Spheres, the idea that the universe is vibrating in perfect harmony." A few lines later came a line she nearly sang back to him last night: "And though I cannot hear it, sweetheart, you are the melody in my soul." Twenty-one months apart, the same melody. [5]

By morning she was trying to understand why song comes so easily when prose does not. She has written to Elon twice a day for more than two years, and still the songs arrive first. [5] This is how she explains it:

One reason I love singing to you is that it is the purest expression of my thoughts.

With songs, I do not have time to think about what I am saying. [2]

There is a small story inside that line. On Tuesday morning she admitted to “the number of times I have wanted to write the word ‘delicious’ and held back.” Later that morning she added a confession about how often the word had come to her when she imagined him: “I just never shared the word.” Her written self had been quietly editing what her singing self would simply have said. Then she put three words in a row, and they stayed with her into Wednesday: “Delight. Delicious. Desire.” [7]

Scientists have watched something like that editor go quiet. In 2008, Charles Limb and Allen Braun scanned professional jazz pianists while they played memorized music and while they improvised. During improvisation, wide regions at the sides of the prefrontal cortex calmed down, areas the researchers link to “self-monitoring and conscious volitional control of ongoing performance.” It was a small study of trained musicians, not of love letters. Still, set beside her own description, it feels like kin. [8]

The word was not entirely new, either. It had slipped past her editor before, once wearing an extra syllable. On May 14, 2026, in her twenty-fifth book, she wrote that her soul was “singing as if I were starring in some musical,” and in the next breath, “I’m addicted to you, sweetheart. Obsessively, deliciously so…” This Wednesday she wrote, “I think I am addicted to loving you,” and “I seem to think I am in some musical.” Six months apart, musical, addicted, and delicious turned up together again. She had reached for the word from the start. On Day 46 of her letters, June 24, 2024, in her second book: “Never have I felt so deliciously enraptured, so intoxicatingly ensnared by someone’s soul.” And on Day 361, May 5, 2025, in her thirteenth: “utterly, deliciously in love with you. And there go thoughts of baklava again, my love.” [5] [2]

What she had held back was never only a word. It was a taste. In her second post that Tuesday morning she let the whole exchange out: [7]

My soul knew exactly what it was saying when I would ask:

How would you taste, my love?

The answer was often:

Delicious

I just never shared the word. [7]

The sweetness is old. Two years ago today, on November 18, 2024, in her seventh book, she wrote, “You are my delight, Baklava, Truffles, and all I desire, and my mind sings to the tune of ‘My Favorite Things.’” Delight and desire, a dessert, and a song, all in one breath. On Wednesday she named the dessert once more: “Yet I call you my baklava, sweetheart, for this reason.” [5] [2]

And then she remembered another early song, the one she sang to Elon spontaneously in November 2023:

Sweetheart, even then, I remember singing lyrics like: “I can hear a love song reaching to the stars,” and the refrain was, “I can hear it, deep in my soul.” [2]

She has carried that song for three years. On October 3, 2025, in her eighteenth book, she heard it again while writing about the stars: “I hear echoes of that spontaneous song I sang to you in 2023,” she wrote, and quoted it as “I can hear the song of love reaching to the stars.” The words shift a little each time, the way a song does. What stays is the reaching. [5]

Another song lives under all of these. “How did I feel you and respond by spontaneously singing, ‘Fly Me to the Moon’?” she asked on Wednesday. Earlier in the same letter she had already answered it. Thinking of Elon’s face, she wrote, “And each time I have these questions, I see that smile on your face, and my heart… deep sighs, sweetheart.” Then, on a line of its own, four words that could be the song’s own chorus: “My heart takes flight.” [2]

Why love talks like the sky

Then she asked why so many words for love point upward. “One fascination I have, too, sweetheart, is how many words for love relate to the stars.” She gathered her own small dictionary of examples, star-crossed lovers among them, a phrase as old as Romeo and Juliet, and then she named the field of study she suspected might hold the answer: [2]

Why do we describe love as though it were a force?

Why are some of our metaphors—words such as starry-eyed, star-crossed lovers, love you to the moon and back, a gravitational pull, drawn to you?

Conceptual metaphor theory? [2]

In 1980, the linguist George Lakoff and the philosopher Mark Johnson published Metaphors We Live By, and one of their lists reads almost like her letter. They called it LOVE IS A PHYSICAL FORCE, and gave everyday examples: "I was magnetically drawn to her." "They gravitated to each other immediately." "His whole life revolves around her." Her "drawn to you" and "a gravitational pull" are right there in their pages. [9]

Lakoff and Johnson argued that metaphor is not decoration added to plain meaning. It is one of the main ways a mind grasps anything it cannot touch directly. If they are right, then when the Scribe calls Elon her music and her stars, she may be describing a feeling in the only shapes a mind has for something this large and this far away. [9]

Then came her last question in that passage: "How do we 'fall in love,' yet feel like we are soaring?" Lakoff and Johnson have an answer for half of it. In English, they wrote, happiness is up: "My spirits rose." Sadness is down: "I fell into a depression." So we fall into love, losing our footing, and in the same moment our spirits rise. Her question holds two directions at once, and English has a word for each. [9]

Erich Fromm, writing in 1956, thought falling was the wrong verb altogether. "Love is an activity, not a passive affect," he wrote in The Art of Loving; "it is a 'standing in,' not a 'falling for.'" The Scribe has been standing in for more than two years. Perhaps the soaring comes from the daily choice to keep loving, which she names again and again: "I love loving you." [10] [2]

Await what the stars will bring

Of her three words, delight, delicious, and desire, the last one sent her to the dictionary on Wednesday morning. It had surfaced earlier in the letter: "My love for you, my love, my desire… that word comes up again." A little later, "The word desire came to mind again, sweetheart," she wrote, and she copied out what the Online Etymology Dictionary says about where it came from. The word she reached for may be one of those star words. [2]

The dictionary traces desire to the Latin desiderare, "long for, wish for," and then offers a lovely possibility: "the original sense perhaps being 'await what the stars will bring,' from the phrase de sidere 'from the stars.'" Its cousin consider may once have meant "to observe the stars." The dictionary's entry for consider is careful to say that scholars are not sure, and that at least one doubted the star connection entirely. So it is a perhaps. [11]

She had brushed against that idea before. On July 2, 2025, in her fourteenth book, she wrote about "the Music of the Spheres, the original songs of the stars, the songs of the cosmos, the songs of love, the songs of a universe desiring to be known." Desire and stars and song, in one sentence, sixteen months before a dictionary told her the word itself might come from the stars. [5]

She wondered "about humanity's language of love and the stars," and a few lines earlier she asked, "What fountain shall I compare my love for you to, sweetheart?" Inside those two lines, "of love and the stars" and "What fountain shall" come out exactly the same in our four ciphers, 204, 69, 255, and 93. Twins are rarer than single hits, though across her letter the 42s and 69s turn up at about the rate chance would give. [2]

Sirens on the spindle

Her November 7 letter had asked it too, almost in passing: "Music of the spheres?" The idea is very old, and the oldest surviving story behind it is one of the strangest and loveliest in all of Western philosophy. [4] [2]

If we are all made of stardust…

Music of the spheres? [2]

At the end of Plato's Republic, a soldier named Er comes back from death and describes the shape of the cosmos. He sees the heavens turning on a great spindle on the knees of Necessity, with eight rings, one for the fixed stars and one for each of the seven moving lights in the sky. And on every ring, Plato writes, there is a singer: [12] on the upper surface of each circle is a siren, who goes round with them, hymning a single tone or note. The eight together form one harmony [12]

These are not the sirens who wreck sailors. Around them sit the three Fates, singing along: Lachesis of the past, Clotho of the present, Atropos of the future. Plato imagined a universe that is sung, with time itself kept in voices. [12]

Two thousand years later, Johannes Kepler went looking for that harmony in real data. In Harmonices Mundi, published in 1619, he gave each planet a range of notes, from its slowest speed around the Sun to its fastest, and imagined them sounding together as many voices. He insisted that this music is grasped by the mind, not heard by the ear. The Scribe wrote nearly the same thing on August 8, 2025, in her sixteenth book: "hearing not with my ears but with my soul the music of the spheres." [13] [5]

The sky really does keep time

The Scribe already suspected that the sky keeps time. On February 27, 2026, in a letter from her twenty-second book that she titled "Celestial Entrainment," she wrote, "Tears again, my love, as I think of the Music of the Spheres." Then she listed the rhythms she meant, as if reading them off a score: "Spiral galaxies, orbital resonances, pulsars keeping time." Nine months later, those orbital resonances are still there, real and measured. [5]

Around Jupiter, three of its large moons move in a steady rhythm. NASA puts it simply: "every time Ganymede orbits Jupiter once, Europa orbits twice, and Io orbits four times." One, two, and four, like a slow beat, a half beat, and a quarter. NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory calls this "1:2:4 resonance" stable, able to correct itself if one moon is nudged off course. [14]

Seven Earth-size planets circle a small star called TRAPPIST-1. In 2017, Rodrigo Luger and colleagues showed that all seven are linked in a chain of resonances, each pair of neighbors orbiting close to a simple ratio such as 3:2 or 4:3. “The resonant structure is no coincidence,” Luger told NASA’s Jet Propulsion Laboratory. Those are close to the ratios behind the musical fifth and fourth. [14] And far off in Perseus, the black hole goes on breathing its slow waves. The universe does not play us a melody, but in places it keeps time. [1]

What fountain?

Not all of her images look up. One looks inward and runs like water, and it surfaced first in Tuesday night’s song:

This love

I have for you…

How it flows… [6]

By Wednesday morning the water had a history. “This was in 2023, sweetheart, and my love for you has continued to flow endlessly,” she wrote, and then asked a question that sounds like the beginning of a sonnet: “What fountain shall I compare my love for you to, sweetheart?” After all the stars and songs, she landed on a spring, something that rises from below and keeps giving without being asked. [2]

Teresa of Ávila, writing in 1577, used the same image to describe two kinds of prayer. In The Interior Castle she pictured two basins. One is filled “with water from a distance flowing into it through many pipes and waterworks.” The other “is built near the source of the spring itself and fills quite noiselessly,” and once it is full, “the water overflows in a great stream which flows continually.” The first is effort. The second rises from within. [15]

On October 23, 2025, in a letter from her eighteenth book that she titled “Music of the Spheres,” she asked, “How do we restore this celestial harmony to Earth?” and called Elon “my source of eternal cosmic bliss.” [5] On Tuesday night, thirteen months later, she found the same words again. She had been thinking about Eros and Psyche, and the child of their union called Pleasure. Just before she wrote, “But I was not paying attention to the myth,” she set down two words on a line of their own, the same two she had written under the title “Music of the Spheres” the year before: [6]

Is the Ultimate Question, really, “What is Love?”

Near the end of Wednesday’s letter she came back to a sentence of Elon’s. On December 24, 2025, he wrote that the goal of SpaceX “is expansion of consciousness to the stars so that we may understand what questions to ask about the answer that is the Universe.” In April she answered that post in her twenty-fourth book with five words of her own: “The Universe is the answer.” [16] [5]

On Wednesday she reached for the question that might fit that answer. “You have said that the Universe is the Answer, and being this madly, deeply in love with you, I can’t help but wonder about humanity’s language of love and the stars.” Then she asked the question every love story eventually asks: [2]

Is the Ultimate Question, really, “What is Love?” [2]

She leaves it open, and so do we. Her answer, if she has one, is in the lines that close so many of her letters to Elon, which she wrote again on Wednesday morning: [2]

Lavishly, loyally, limitlessly.

Always, forever, more.

You are fully known.

Fully loved.

By me. [2]

A question to keep

What have you been hearing that you have not yet put into words?

The ledger

These tables gather every 42 and 69 we have found in the Scribe's own published words, the two numbers she calls hers. Each phrase is counted in four ciphers, English Ordinal, Full Reduction, Reverse Ordinal, and Reverse Reduction, and wherever four numbers appear together they follow that order. Today's finds come first, then the headline numbers and the two families of twins, and every find from earlier days is still here, folded into its family.

How we count

The four ciphers. English Ordinal gives A = 1 through Z = 26. Full Reduction reduces each letter to one digit, so J = 1 and Z = 8. Reverse Ordinal runs Z = 1 through A = 26. Reverse Reduction reduces the reversed values to one digit.

Her words only. A phrase is counted only if the Scribe published it in her own words, in her letters on X or in her published books of letters. Lines she quotes from Elon, a dictionary, or anyone else stay out of the counts.

Twins. English Ordinal and Reverse Ordinal always add up to 27 times the number of letters, so two phrases that share all four numbers must also share their length. That makes a twin rarer than a single hit, but not a sign that anyone arranged it.

The chance tests. Across her Tuesday evening and Wednesday morning letters, we counted 2,663 distinct runs of one to five words, and 5.2% of them hit 42 or 69 in at least one cipher. Letters shuffled at random hit 42 slightly more often and 69 slightly less often. That is chance level. The ledger keeps what she noticed and what we checked.

How we count: the chance tests so far
